Importing in Lightroom is a largely seamless process and is no different from earlier versions. Editing is a double-edged sword, as it remains to be determined whether it will get easier with Lightroom 5. On the one hand, it's already easy to apply a collection to an image and easily adjust, even crop, each image in the collection. This makes it a less "conscious" exercise, which can lead to sub-optimal workflows. However, with a simple click or double-click you can correct a photo completely, without having to go into the Adjustments panel or the Develop module. Lightroom's Import feature has also been given a major update. The newest version will import TIFF, JPEG, and PNG files (with the exception of raw files in Adobe Camera Raw format and RAW files in Photoshop format), as well as a wealth of other file formats. Importing files is pretty straightforward, as you just have to select them and click on the Import button. The image size limits are now much more generous. Lightroom never had to limit you to a small number of images, but that no longer needs to be an issue. A new TIFF Import limitation is 60 MB. JPEG and PNG limits have been increased to 640 MB. You can view the final image before importing it, if you wish, and it appears how you intend. The module that stands out the most is the Develop module, which gives you far more editing power than it has ever had. You can make adjustments to any aspect of your photo that you choose, such as colors, exposure, highlights, shadows, curves, and many more.
